DIRECTOR'S NOTE

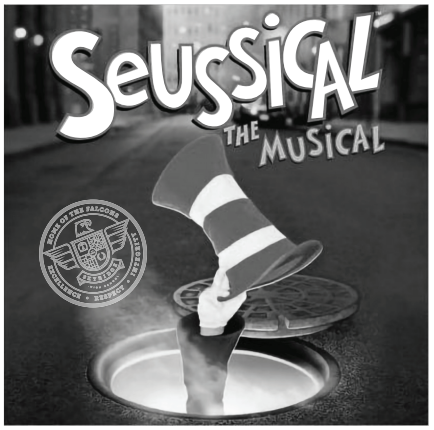

In recreating J.M. Barie's Peter and Wendy for our times, Jeremy Bloom transforms the stage into the world of Never-Never Land, as his pajama-clad performers fly, dance, and move around the space in perfect sync.

Bloom explains his Peter/Wendy, saying "it's not some new crazy adaptation, but the story stripped down to its bare elements. The book was intended to be read aloud to children, but it was also written and continuously rewritten by a person in a state of perpetual loss. All of the characters are fiercely grown up enough to have ideas about death and to be exhilarated by good storytelling."

Bloom uses "happy thoughts" from the audience each night, as well as passers-by on the street, to create the pixie dust needed to make Peter/Wendy fly. He then employs his unique bare-bones, "image-staging" which involves the use of hand-held lights, the simplest of sets, and narrative movement to retell the tale of the one boy who never grew up, inspired by the dark and delightful words of its creater, J.M. Barrie.
